Although Photoshop is known as a photo editing program, it can also be used as a vector graphic editor. All the elements and tools discussed in the following pages can be used to create vector graphic elements. Vector graphics are a type of graphic design that can grow and shrink, not only in size, but also in shape. Vector graphics allow designers to create their own format and store more detail than raster graphics. This is the reason why Photoshop can be used as a vector graphic editor, but it is not a vector graphic design tool. However, if you are new to Photoshop or any of its tools, it's a good idea to try to find the default color mode. For instance, the default color mode for the Levels tool is a pretty good first-color-mode choice when you start to edit images. # Color Mode The default color mode of the tools, palette, and channels does come into play when you edit image files. Q: Can a proc submit a second job with SqlJob? We are building an application with SqlBrick and SqlServer jobs, which utilizes a shared folder for a SQL job to consume data. It's a fairly large set of data, so we want to start the jobs as soon as the shared folder appears to be complete. To avoid having our SQL jobs running forever, we'd like to start them with a short timeout, so there's no delay when the job first starts. However, we'd also like to start a new job after some of the data is ingested so we are guaranteed that some of the jobs will complete before the next starts. Is it possible to have a SqlJob start a second job when it's done ingesting the data, and catch the job ID returned by the new job? If not, what is a viable work-around? We've seen that a SQL Agent job can have both a Start and Cancel schedule, but that seems like a silly thing to do. A: Sure. Each SqlJob has a unique SessionGuid, which should be the same as the session GUID of the first job in the queue. You can capture the session GUID from the first job, and start the second job like this: `SqlJob job = db.Jobs.FirstOrDefault(x => x.SessionGuid == sessionGUID); if (job!= null) // Start the second job else // Start the first job` So, in your case, if you have two jobs, queueing them up in a single queue would be Job 1 starts. Job 1 adds itself to the queue. Job 2 starts. Job 1 quits Job 2 starts. Job 2 finishes. The case study, which was conducted to promote the upcoming American Manufacturing Summit, reveals a client engaged with i6's CRM service for more than eight months. That was before the client knew enough about the product to have a better idea how to use it.
