Q: how to find the parent path in a git repository? I don't know how to find the parent path of the most specific commit in a git repository? For example, the commit name/sha is a0d56dd..., but I want to find the path of a0d56dda2... A: Git keeps track of its path history. In git-blame --stat, the path argument is what is printed in the output. If the commit you are examining is the root of the project, you can do git blase --stat (The commit-tree-ish string is the SHA-1 commit name, except if you have a branch name, which would be in the second argument, . The actual commit-ish string is the SHA-1 for that commit.) The ability to ask Git which commit is the root of the project depends on what commit your Git is on. If you created the repository from a bare or non-bare repository, then in HEAD you will find the commit where git-clone started. In any other case, you'll find yourself in the "work-tree", which is a step-up location inside the Git repository. There you'd have to inspect the objects in that repository to find the root. The objects in the HEAD commit are stored in your work-tree, but the objects in the rest of the repository will be found in an "index". Finally, the commit object is stored in the root of the tree. Note that there are several different kinds of objects: commits, trees, and blobs. If you examine the commit objects, you'll see there is really no central 'head' of the commit. The name HEAD is applied at the top-level, in the main branch of the repository. This name is only relevant to the first commit; for all other commits, HEAD is empty. In any case, you can use `git rev-list` to find the parent of any commit, starting with the leftmost commit that is reachable. That gives you the commit object, which you can get the name and other data for. If you get a set of one or more commit objects `edd6d56e20`
