The recent development of a high-performance liquid chromatographic assay for the measurement of both ciprofloxacin and norfloxacin in urine and bronchoalveolar lavage fluid has allowed studies of pulmonary accumulation and transport of these agents. In human alveolar macrophages, ciprofloxacin uptake was found to occur with a time course similar to that observed in pulmonary epithelial cells, reaching a steady-state value when exposed to a final concentration of 1 micrograms/ml, which was 1.6 times that of the free drug in the incubation medium. Norfloxacin uptake also showed a time- and concentration-dependent behavior. The 3e33713323
