Although life events have been implicated in some reproductive disorders, the evidence supporting an association with semen quality is limited and inconsistent. The present study was designed to address this issue. Parental life events were measured on the basis of subjective reports using a questionnaire and semen quality was measured using an internationally recommended method. Our data showed that men who had experienced a higher number of financial-related life events in the previous 2 years had semen with reduced percentage of motile sperm and sperm with lower concentration. The evidence for an association was strong when we consider the causal inferences. Given the cross-sectional nature of the study, our results 3da54e8ca3
