Shareware has been described as "reverse-engineering" the concept of free software and as a sort of "freemium" game in which a (usually) free software product is sold by requiring the user to be willing to pay money. This is usually done by using a different desktop icon and/or the name of the program and by requiring some kind of registration code. Shareware is "embarrassingly" easy to do and "not that illegal" as far as copyright law is concerned. Software developers often have no desire to get into trouble; most use it because they can still achieve the same result for much less money and effort than it would cost to buy a license. A (very) small proportion of software can be classified as true "shareware", meaning that you cannot get the product other than by paying a purchase price which does not exceed the development costs. In most cases, the only restrictions are legal ones (the terms and conditions), not to sell anything else, not to sublicense, and not to resell the product as a whole (such as used games). For example, there is no restriction on allowing you to distribute it with a newer version (on top), or for supporting it on a different operating system. This is because shareware usually has some sort of registration or licensing key attached to it (just to "sell" you something), while true shareware has no restrictions and is released free of charge (or almost). The terms and conditions of most shareware do not allow you to distribute it, or make changes to the original code, or to add anything for your own use. You usually cannot do it outside of the shareware product itself. The licensing key is a piece of text or a simple algorithm to determine the validity of the software. Another common type of shareware
