Forty-eight patients with classic carpal tunnel syndrome underwent a carpal tunnel release with either nerve grafting (in 30) or a standard open release (in 18). Patients were evaluated preoperatively and 3, 6, and 12 months postoperatively using a preoperative versus postoperative difference score. The second and third carpal tunnel syndrome severity grading systems also were assessed. Results were measured on the basis of the change from preoperative values to the most recent postoperative values. Both techniques resulted in improvement in symptom severity scores. However, an evaluation of the improvement in symptom severity score found no significant difference in improvement between nerve grafting and open release. In this study, the authors found no difference between the results of carpal tunnel syndrome release with either nerve grafting or an open release.Characterization of the language deficits in children with spina bifida: The relationship to motor impairment and the presence of phonological dyslexia.
