www.redhat.com/manuals/linux/RHEL/Bootstrap/enterprise/2.6/en-US/CH04-101.html ...this way you can boot the second hard disk, run your maintenance tools (i.e. fsck and passwd), then boot the first disk and copy the file system over.... A: Bud Redhead doesn't appear to be a system component, so you can't install it in the same way you might install other applications. You'll have to find its uninstaller in Add / Remove programs. The version 1.0 x86 package should be sufficient to uninstall this application. It might be better to run a general system cleaning and maintenance tool like CCleaner beforehand. If you decide to do it that way, you might get a little more elbow room with the installation of the next program. The purpose of this research is to develop a method to identify and isolate lymphocyte subpopulations with specificities for immunogens. The basic approach is to use immunoassays specific for the superantigens to identify putative lymphocyte subpopulations. Superantigens are exotoxins secreted by a subset of gram negative rods which stimulate a population of T lymphocytes without specific receptors. The exotoxins are the products of gene families on pathogenic enteric bacteria and mimic the selective action of the MHC. The idea is that these molecules will be useful in identifying unique lymphocyte populations that recognize bacterial antigens
