Beware of a Migraine Progression to Cluster Headache A Cluster Headache is a new headache without any typical migraine triggers or symptoms and its exact origin is not yet known. What Causes Headache Cluster? Cluster headaches are an episodic disorder that cannot be diagnosed until the headache has been present for several hours, and after a headache-free period. Cluster headaches are generally characterized by a unilateral and very severe headache. Although the characteristic onset of the headache is in a single episodic cluster, cluster headaches are not infrequent among people with migraine with a significant reduction of migraine attacks. During Cluster Attacks The pain is usually severe and sometimes excruciating, being characterized as a very tight and painful pressure inside the affected eye, forehead, nose and throat. During Cluster Attacks The duration of headache attacks generally exceeds 4 hours, although some individuals suffer attacks that last for up to 36 hours. Attacks can recur frequently and tend to cluster and the typical progression is from one migraine attack to another, without any “break” between them. Patients may be well-aware of the vulnerability to cluster headaches, but the typical environmental factors, besides stress, have not been elucidated. During Cluster Attacks Although most cases are sporadic, a large percentage of patients have a family history of the disorder and it occurs in an autosomal dominant fashion. During Cluster Attacks A combination of the association between migraine and cluster headache has been described; in fact, patients with cluster headache are more likely to have migraine, and patients with migraine are more likely to develop cluster headache, compared to people with no history of migraines. It is also likely that the activation of the trigeminal nucleus caudalis is associated to the occurrence of migraine attacks, but it is also plausible that the trigeminal nucleus caudalis is abnormally sensitive as well as dysregulated in cluster headache. Furthermore, although structural changes in the brain have not been clearly demonstrated, the trigeminal nucleus caudalis is a source of afferent fibers, which innervate the internal and external carotid sinus. A very frequent migraine mechanism is the reactivation of the trigeminal nucleus caudalis and the subsequent release of the Amphibious Corpsman An Amphibious Corpsman (AC) is a non-commissioned rank in the British Army that corresponds to the United States Navy rank of Amphibious Corpsman (AC). The rank of AC was introduced in the 1980s to replace the ranks of Naval Medical Corpsman, Mechanized Corpsman, Motorized Corpman, and Mobile Corpsman. Specialist roles The chief role of the AC is to provide first aid to casualties on water, land or in the air. Equipment The AC is equipped with an Australian Civilian Type 14 stretcher. The AC, like the other Corpsmen, are restricted to carrying only the items listed in the table below.
