Gutsy Firefox 3.0 looks mighty fine - thecoffman ====== tptacek There's another thing to realize about Webkit/Gecko-based browsers: They aren't new. This is the first version of Firefox for the Webkit/Gecko processor family since 1998, and it looks like it. ------ andreyf Interesting. I wonder how this is better than Chrome? Could they be stepping aside from the old Struts 1.0-style framework to a standard MVC style with no wildcards? I wonder how much JS programming work went into this. ~~~ whughes I'm sure it's nicer than anything Google has produced since 1998. ~~~ citricsquid I'd be curious to know what your opinion is, because if you look at Google's codebase it's a massively diverse collection of technologies. ------ devmonk I would have preferred another icon. The new stable Firefox icon came out in late September. The proposed research will characterize in-house and commercial high-throughput proteomics platforms and demonstrate their ability to characterize the U.S. Army Special Operations Command (USASOC) Alpha Workspace Study (AWS) collection, a representative set of militarily relevant biofluids. The Alpha workspace will consist of 10 biofluid types, including blood, saliva, urine, feces, seminal fluid, and vomit. The AWS biomarker repository is an important component of the new Atomic Biosystems Proteomics Initiative for Soldier Health (ABPS-SIH), a multi-year, $25 million effort sponsored by the USASOC to apply molecular sciences to field-able platforms to develop improved means to identify and treat diseases. The AWS specimens are collected from consenting active duty and retired military subjects who are either at the National Personnel Records Center (NPRC) and National Database for Entry-Level Assessment (NDELA) in St. Louis, or, are sent to the center in concert with their deployments. The program described in this proposal is designed to provide the Army with a complete set of biofluid collections that can be used to validate specimens collected by the Bio-Barriers
