It's teeny-tiny but has a big impact: UN may designate 'dangerous' gaps in Google's Street View map The Google map of a small section of a Tokyo street is not quite the same after tiny camera-equipped cars rolled through and were supposed to be obscured by plants. In fact, the gaps in detail could be having a bigger impact on the internet than the 2011 Fukushima nuclear plant disaster. The UN warned this week that uncalled-for gaps in a Silicon Valley-purchased Street View map created in 2009 pose as a "public privacy concern," according to Vice News. Google has been ordered by the Russian government and the BBC to remove all of its Street View content from the country, but in the UK a second investigation was made that did not result in a similar order. in are known to be up-regulated in dendritic cells following Toxoplasma infection (Doxsey et al., [B6]). The Th1 protective profile associated with antibody response against Toxoplasma would appear to be augmented by A24/40 activation of Fc receptors on Th1 cells which would amplify the Th1 response by a mechanism independent of opsonization. Our model would provide insight into the processes initiated by the A24/40 activation pathway to induce Th1 immunity. A24/40 was initially identified as a CD23-binding protein in human B-lymphocytes (Hochman et al., [B17]). More recently, A24/40 was identified as a potential receptor for MAMPs, as well as a receptor for A β 42 and A β 40, a central element of the AD phenotype (Qian et al., [B29]). Like our studies, these two studies demonstrated expression of A24/40 in monocytes and macrophages. It is interesting that although they demonstrated up-regulation of A24/40 upon exposure to both A β peptides, A β 42 showed stronger activation. A24/40 is known to bind to collagen and laminin (Vignais et al., [B39]). Whether A24/40 binding to A β 42 is the result of increased association with substrate or whether A24/40 is involved in the deposition of A β 42 into the extracellular environment warrants investigation. A24/40 has been implicated in several inflammatory conditions, as well as playing a role in phagocytosis (Vignais et al., [B39]; Tschopp et al., [B38]). Our studies support a role for A24/40 in phagocytosis, as well as interactions between A24/40 and pathogen molecules during a Th1-mediated response. Activation of a Th1 response against intracellular pathogens, such as Toxoplasma, has been associated with induction of proinflammatory cytokines, IL-12, IFN- γ , and TNF (Mohr et al., [B22]; Pathak et al., [B26]). In the context of AD, it is possible that A24/40 has a role in regulating or modulating these inflammatory cytokines; however, further studies are required to confirm this. We demonstrate that A24/40
