Mental health care recipients come to mental health care services with problems that may be projected by the people who constitute their significant others. This paper begins with discussion of the complex web of early experiences leading to the interlocking factors that contribute to vulnerability, and then explores how this vulnerability is used by aggressors, and by mentally ill victims, to abuse the vulnerable. Discriminatory practices, extreme levels of power, and the usual forms of control and domination are examined. Vulnerability in mental health care may be more a symptom of the system's failings than of inherent personality traits in the client. Recent reforms offer hope for more openness and discussion about neglected issues of power and vulnerability. be fooled." Yet those in France who dream of a coup already are scarily organizing. Le Maghreb Arabique reported last week that before the elections, the Islamist movement Ennahda held a secret meeting of its leaders to ensure a stable government. And the Party of the Muslims, already strong in some rural districts, is planning electoral surprises, according to the newspaper El Saeb. Lawyers for the party's candidate in the first round of voting suggested that their campaign be moved forward by a week. A group called the Al-Qaeda Network for the Defence of Human Rights told the paper the Ennahda candidate has been nominated to put forward candidates for a future election in his homeland of Tunisia, and the French authorities might have acted on those plans. Key politicians promise key votes Others are preparing to vote for candidates with other agendas but little chance of winning. The "Red Hand" party of Ali Larayedh, a leading Tunisian Beji poster artist, promised more openness in politics. The BNLD, headed
