The tech was used during a live countdown on FIFA.com, playing the pre-match trailer of the Fifa 22 Product Key beta. “This is the first time in a flagship video game that we are creating a player model for this technology with a full fit and then use that player model from day one of development,” said Marcel Fratzscher, Executive Producer. “The simulation feels totally different when you play it.” The technology debuted on the PES 2019 Demo, where the player models were directly captured from real life motion data. “I’m very proud to have been able to develop a system where you can feel the sensation of actually feeling the sensation of being in a player from day one,” said PES Senior Producer Toru Iwatani. Top row: Daniel Azevedo, Lucas Mondini, Frederik Andersen Bottom row: Christian Zapata, Kerim Frei, Mohammad Skousi A team of specialists, all with postgraduate degrees, researched, created, and tested the simulation together as a cohesive whole. This included everything from creating player models, to creating the ball movement behaviours. “There is a massive amount of technical challenges in creating something like this,” says Senior Technical Designer Christian Zapata. “But what’s amazing is that all these technical challenges were overcome in a way that makes it really easy for the player to experience the game and understand how the various elements are connected.” In addition to technological challenges, the team had to use advanced research from the fields of neurobiology, biomechanics, psychology, and cognitive science to understand what would be required to develop an interactive experience for the consumer which would make them feel like they were actually in a player. “Neurobiology really informs the game design in so many ways,” says Technical Lead Lucas Mondini. “For example, we know that the part of the brain responsible for coming up with tactics is the prefrontal cortex, which doesn’t activate until someone is about to commit to a decision. We know that humans instinctively seek decision consistency, and avoid inconsistency in their decisions. That’s something we apply to game design.” “So when the player makes a decision, we try to make sure that it’s consistent with the way they’ve made those decisions in the past,👉
