Features Australian citizenship can be revoked Updated Australian citizenship can be revoked under new legislation introduced last month by the federal government. Under the changes, the power of the Minister for Immigration and Citizenship (the IAC) to strip citizenship from people who commit an "undesirable act" has been expanded. "It's almost like you can get a drug test before you're allowed to board an airplane," Law Council of Australia president Arthur Moses told the ABC. "This is an administrative discretion which you'll be able to lodge an appeal [of] on the basis that you are not a security risk to our community." How to renounce your citizenship You can renounce your citizenship either by lodging an application directly with the IAC or through a lawyer. Applications must be lodged within six months of being notified by the IAC of its decision, but if it is reversed on appeal, the applicant can still file a claim for a refund of the application fee.

Send your confidential tips to ps@abc.net.au Under the new legislation, the Minister may accept an offer of voluntary renunciation at the IAC's discretion. Mr Moses said he feared the legislation was "backward-looking" and "could result in a lot of people being stripped of their citizenship simply because they've made a mistake." "We've got to prevent the camel from sitting on the tracks [of the train]," he said.

"When we have a law which says you can be stripped of citizenship if you
