This process was employed by a pilot plant and allowed to decrease the size of the particles present in the final liquid fraction. The feeding conditions for both technologies were optimized to maximize the fractional yield. To validate the results, in addition to a classical design of a laminar flow reactor, a batch reactor was used. The major output of the two processes was a liquid fraction and the solid fraction and the solid fraction in the final liquid fraction process was characterized. The different fractions were characterized to determine their potential use as substrates for the production of biofuels. Additionally, the effects of the treatment were studied by using a moisture indicator dye (Calgon green 3B) to evaluate the changes in the physical and chemical properties of the samples. A TSE-based process provided, on average, a higher fractional yield chan the TSE (around 50%), with particles between 5 and 12 mm having a melting temperature of 60-100 °C. The use of the drying of the liquid fractions provided a final moisture content between 4% and 6%. The SP allowed, on average, a higher fractional yield than the TSE (around 70%) and produced a solid fraction with a melting temperature of 40-60 °C and a moisture content between 4% and 6%. The pilot plant evaluated resulted to be an effective and less expensive technology to obtain liquid fractions with low moisture content from FW, which are ideal for the valorization of the extracted carbon contained in this material.Q: Adding new address to contacts I am working in Android.
