powerful .A narrative review of the impact of menopause on functional limitations and the strategies used to manage functional limitations. In this narrative review, we examine the factors influencing the functional limitations experienced by older postmenopausal women, and the strategies used to manage functional limitations. A narrative review was conducted using literature published up to December 2015. Predetermined inclusion criteria were applied. We found limited evidence to support the hypothesis that aging is an important predisposing factor for physical functional limitations in women. There is some evidence to suggest that menopause can have an impact on functional limitations in women. There are no clinical studies that comprehensively examine the impact of menopause on functional limitations. The focus of previous studies has been on the physical and emotional health of older women and their function. However, a new model of care incorporating a focus on the interaction between illness, functional limitations, and quality of life is emerging. This narrative review provides a summary of the factors influencing functional limitations in older postmenopausal women and highlights the need for further research. This invention pertains to the hydrolytic stabilization of polyvinylchloride (PVC) polymeric resins against change of properties, notably improved color stability, achieved by treating the PVC resin with an effective amount of an inhibitor compound containing an O,O'-dihydroperoxide moiety.

The preparation of various olefinic monomers, such as vinyl chloride, vinyl acetate, styrene, allyl chloride, and the like, is well-known in the art. These reactions are typically performed with substantial quantities of a free radical generator, such as a free radical initiator or peroxide compound, and a solvent, such as water, lower alcohols, or other organic solvents. The free radical generator serves to initiate the polymerization, in addition to functioning as a chemical cross-linking agent. In the case of polyvinylchloride, and in many cases, other types of polymeric resins, the free radical generators are typically selected so as to avoid cross-linking reactions. Furthermore, the free radical generators selected should not require the presence of an appreciable amount of solvents. Thus
