Inspired by wind. The labyrinth is a game where the player must guide a brightly colored square through a randomly generated maze. The player controls the square with the arrow keys and when it touches a wall it will disappear. The walls are also randomly generated, each wall is 20x20 cells and you start in cell 18. The game ends when the square reaches a transparent final square. What can you do now? Development diary When I started making the game, I didn't really have a vision. The most important things for me was that it should be randomly generated and the player should be able to control the brightness of the square. As I got more and more control over the code I started to think more into the design. I added the level generator so the game would be able to adjust to what I could squeeze out of my computer. I also started to work on the game a little on my own because it felt like a game I wanted to make. I was lucky because I found a quite good system for the random generation of the walls. I wrote the game in modular way, using a base library to build all my own modules. I used a very simple scale system with four levels. The first is how I wanted the game to look when the player just starts. The next two levels are getting tougher and harder. The last level is meant to be really difficult and maybe impossible to finish without a guide. I wanted to give the player four options to change the difficulty when they got into a tough spot. I kept the pace of the game pretty high and that made everything much easier. I did forget about some nice things that would be easier to add when everything started to fill up. As I was working on the game I realized I really enjoy programming and I really want to make more games. I thought about how the game could be improved and how I could make it more user friendly. What are you doing right now? Over the summer I made quite a bit of work on the Labyrinth game. I created a game runner that could adjust the game, all my own game properties and work on the required things that come up with the game. I also added some extra features like a checkpoint system so you won't lose the progress if you get stuck in the game. The last change I made was I increased the cellsize to 50x50. That made the game a lot easier and the game could easily be extended to a much bigger field. The level generator is still
