The Pokémon Company is gearing up to celebrate the 20th Anniversary of Pokémon by asking fans to help identify Pokémon from 1990's generation 1. Pokémon Colosseum's director Yuichi Ikezawa spoke to 4Gamer about the upcoming events, which include a card tournament to be held on December 1, a quiz show called "Pokémon Can't Speak", and an art exhibition to be held on December 14. 4Gamer: This year is the 20th anniversary since Pokémon was first released. What would you say the big highlights of this year are? Yuichi Ikezawa: Pokémon Sun and Moon. They're airing in July, and they're just about to start their game-selling phase. The popularity of the franchise has also been steadily increasing. Even if people who don't know anything about Pokémon don't have any expectations of the series, they will start to recognize it. I think that this is a golden opportunity to release new games in July, and I'm very grateful for that. 4Gamer: I remember, the second generation of the Pokémon games released in late 1996. But after that, what happened? Yuichi Ikezawa: The focus of Pokémon games was changed to the second generation's Pocket Monsters. When the second generation of games finished, the third generation launched. And then the fourth generation came out. And now, the fifth generation is approaching us. Each generation has had games like these released. I think it's very heartwarming. 4Gamer: I would really like to know... If people say, "This is a Japanese game," what's the response? Yuichi Ikezawa: It's usually not that big of a deal. Because we're generally speaking about both the development and sale of Pokémon games in Japan, it's not that big of a thing. (laughs) 4Gamer: The main characters of Pokémon Sun and Moon are also women. That's something that isn't seen a lot. Yuichi Ikezawa: It's been a while. Right now, this generation, it's been a while since we've gotten to see the main characters of Pokémon be female. (laughs) There haven't been that many game examples where the lead character is a woman. With the

Nestled in the rolling hills of Canada and population just a few hundred people. Many of those people live in the town of Frodsham. The town shares a common epithet with many another rural settlement to live and work in the heart of a small town. Its small; of little significance to the larger world. Nestled in the valley of the River Trent. A major river in the North of England, not a river that flows to the ocean, but rather a small river that runs through the town and on to the sea. Frodsham is a town that is not seen by many people; not a town of the rich, not a town of tourists, a town that just of the country for the country people. When I first arrived to Frodsham, the town of Frodsham itself was not terribly enthralling. The river was beautiful; peaceful and green. It wasn't until I walked around the town that things started to change. I first walked along the main street, (the main street is a main street in most towns and villages as the name suggests) and saw the local factory that made bus ticket vending machines; this was a somewhat incongruous sight for a town of Frodsham. The main street of the town was also very different than the other main streets I had seen so far; there were no small shops to be found here. The main street was adorned with local cafes and restaurants, some that I was familiar with, some not familiar at all. It was a little bit like what I had seen in Reading, a country town for country people. One place in particular struck me; a couple of buildings that were painted a bright green, and seemed like the original design of the town. The places depicted a forerunner of the town, a time when the local people had dreams of a better future and had painted their very own rendition of their story. Only one building; there were eight of them in total, but only one. The building depicted a man on a path. He was walking in the woods; wading through the wet foliage. He was alone, but he didn't seem worried. The foliage and the lack of people made me question what was going on in the painting. He was walking in the woods alone... Everything about the town and the man seemed so desolate. Perhaps it was the painting's message; of a man dreaming of
