This invention relates generally to a process of extruding a billet and more specifically, to an extrusion process for extruding a plurality of billet layers arranged vertically. Extrusion is commonly used to manufacture structural members that can be used to support light and heavy loads. For example, in the aircraft industry, structural support members are often made from aluminum, titanium, or an alloy of these metals. These structural members are typically used to support the cargo of an airplane. Previously, all of these structural members were made as hollow members. It was found that the hollow members made using the extrusion processes were cheaper to manufacture because less material was used to form the structural member. With the advent of composite technology, the composite industry started to provide structural members that are more economically than hollow members. However, the structural members that are being manufactured today are still made as hollow members. At least one known extrusion process that provides an extruded structural member that is devoid of internal cavities is disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 5,395,169 to Mocerri et al. In Mocerri, an aluminum billet is used to manufacture a structural member. Mocerri discloses a die that is coaxial with the billet and includes a plurality of axial flow passages. The die includes a first extrusion flow channel formed by a pair of tapered dies. A cylindrical die having an axial flow passage is positioned over the first tapered die. The second die is coaxial with the cylindrical die and includes a second tapered die that engages with the billet. The billet is coaxial with the first and second tapered dies and is drawn into the tapered dies. The billet is extruded through the first tapered die. Due to the internal tapered walls of the first tapered die, the billet is extruded into a cylindrical tube. The cylindrical tube is coaxially positioned over the second tapered die. The second tapered die is tapered relative to the cylindrical die such that the tapered walls engage the billet. As a result, the billet is extruded through the second tapered die into a second tube. The second tube is then axially cut to form a structural member. Although the structural members made using the process of Mocerri provide advantages over hollow members, the process of Mocerri has several disadvantages. For example, when the cylindrical tube is axially cut
