Localization of beta 3-adrenergic receptor mRNA expression in the guinea pig hypothalamus, hippocampus, spinal cord and brain stem by in situ hybridization. The biological effects of beta-agonists, particularly their influence on the brain, are not completely understood. Since the peripheral sympathetic nervous system receives its main input from the brain, the distribution of the beta-adrenergic receptor subtypes in the brain may contribute to better understand its mode of action. In the present study, the expression of beta 3-AR mRNA was investigated in the hypothalamus, hippocampus, spinal cord and brain stem of guinea pigs. Hybridization with digoxigenin-labeled antisense probes was visualized by a sensitive immunohistochemical technique based on the peroxidase-antiperoxidase (PAP) technique. The hybridization signal was localized in discrete, nonoverlapping neurons of the periventricular hypothalamus, including arcuate and paraventricular neurons. In the hypothalamic arcuate nucleus, the hybridization signal was localized in numerous perikarya and neurons projecting to the median eminence. In the ventral hippocampus, a distinct hybridization signal was localized in a discrete group of nerve fibers between the stratum granulosum and the molecular layer. The beta 3-AR mRNA was also detected in non-neuronal cells of various brain areas, such as the ependymal cells lining the third ventricle, the striatal neurons, and the granular cells of the cerebellar molecular layer. In the spinal cord, mRNA for beta 3-AR was detected in neurons in the central gray matter (laminae I and IX) of the ventral horn, in small neurons in the lumbar tract, and in large neurons in the dorsal horn.

Q: Why did the gender of the player characters ("barbarian" and "princess") impact my story? I started this short story, about a magic kingdom in danger, on a typical afternoon. When I realized that this was the last chapter, I immediately switched to first-person as I became so excited after running the whole thing through my mind; I went through several drafts, changing things around, adding scenes, and what not, trying to give the best possible feel to it. It was the best moment of my life, the best moment for a writer. I eventually made it public on Nuo, where I was already fairly well known for my writing. But I'm not happy with how it turned out. I realize this is a horrible thing to say, but my main problem is that the genders of the protagonists (a male and a female character) came to influence the writing too much, despite the fact that the story was not necessarily going to end up being thematically about gender. And this is pretty much the only thing I didn't know how to handle when writing, so I'm pretty worried that I'll have to rewrite the whole thing, and then rewrite it again, and then maybe again. I'd like to know if it's normal to have a story that slowly turn into a character specific rp. Or should I avoid writing things like this, considering that it could be ruin the story for me later on? I'd like to make sure I don't let this happen to my future writing too. EDIT: Ok, now that I have time to think about it, this is already the first time it's happened to me, but that's not really what this question is about. I'm asking about the possibility of developing a story in the first person too strongly, as that's the kind of story I started writing. This might seem like a 'non-answer', but this is what I was actually thinking about, and now I'm trying to make it more clear. A: That's totally normal. I know you're not happy with what happened but it's not uncommon for a story to be written in different personas rather than one single viewpoint. It also doesn't have to be gender related. Sex Related is usually the easiest, but rp may carry more weight/personalities. For example, your story is a fantasy tale of a human kingdom. However, if you want to make it more impactful,
