Occupational exposures, chronic, and acute respiratory diseases in China and their potential interactions. With the emergence of China in the world economy, the occupational health and safety of Chinese workers have become increasingly important. This paper reviews the occupational exposures, chronic, and acute respiratory diseases among Chinese workers in the newly developed areas of China, and discusses possible interactions between occupational exposures and acute respiratory diseases. Chinese workplaces are generally of lower occupational hygienic standards than those in developed countries, with workers frequently exposed to a variety of chemical, physical, and biological hazards. This is particularly true in the welding industry and chemical factories. Studies have shown that chronic and acute respiratory diseases are also common among Chinese workers. An association between acute respiratory infections and chronic obstructive pulmonary disease (COPD) has been reported. Childhood infections, such as upper respiratory tract infections, pneumonia, bronchitis, and asthma, are significantly associated with the development of COPD. Other factors related to COPD include use of tobacco, genetic susceptibility, and air pollutants. Occupational exposures have also been associated with the development of asthma, and a clear dose-response relationship has been observed.

Q: Get Google driver's version with Robot and Java I have a customer which has been using robots for quite a while now and does not want to change the version (3.11.0 in the code below). This system is a big Java/SpringMVC app, which is using an EJB and the rest of the application works just fine with this EJB, which is why I need the driver. I need to find a way to query the current version that I use (in the code below: karate.log.driver.version). I have tried karate.log.driver.version I have also tried * def version = context.getProperty('kapua.driver.version') * def driverVersion = safety of an 8-day corticosteroid-sparing regimen for chronic IgG4-related disease with severe clinical symptoms: results of a prospective study. IgG4-related disease (IgG4-RD) is a multisystemic chronic disease characterized by high serum IgG4 concentration and a characteristic histopathologic picture, which typically includes an infiltration of lymphocytes and plasmacytes into the affected tissue. Although the clinical features are variable and nonspecific, refractory localized or systemic cases may develop difficult problems such as severe hepatobiliary involvement. We evaluated the efficacy and safety of 8 days of corticosteroid-sparing therapy for the treatment of refractory IgG4-RD. A prospective single-arm study was performed in consecutive refractory IgG4-RD patients treated with corticosteroid-sparing therapy. Primary endpoint was improvement in organ dysfunction score.

Secondary endpoints were response rate, safety and treatment-free survival. Thirty-two IgG4-RD patients were recruited, and 88% of them were male and 88% were aged more than 50 years.

At baseline, 94% of patients had at least 1 organ involvement. At week 8, the mean dose of prednisone was reduced by 46.2% (1.54 mg/kg/d to 0.89 mg/kg/d). The median treatment-free survival was 20.5 months. At week 8, the median score of IgG4-RD-related organ dysfunction was significantly improved (2.5 points from 2.0 points, P
