Abuse and addiction have a multifactorial basis, in which individuals with an underlying predisposition plus a unique environment (i.e., cocaine-using peers and/or stress) may be more susceptible to substance use/abuse. The field of addiction genetics is primarily focused on identifying the gene that confers risk for drug use/abuse. The polymorphisms in the gene-coding and regulatory regions of the candidate gene-that have been most consistently associated with substance use/abuse include the dopamine transporter (SLC6A3), the melanocortin 1 receptor gene (MC1R), dopamine-beta-hydroxylase (DBH), catechol-O-methyltransferase (COMT), neuregulin-1 (NRG1), brain-derived neurotrophic factor (BDNF), and the CACNA1C (calcium channel, voltage-dependent, alpha1C subunit) gene. Moreover, research shows that common variants in several of these genes are associated with substance abuse/dependence. However, it is clear that candidate gene approaches may only be identifying one component of a complex genetic risk model. As evidenced by a recent case-control study, the differential impact of gene-gene interactions on the contribution of specific genes to the risk for substance use/abuse has not been fully explored. It is likely that these gene-gene interactions may significantly alter the contribution of specific genes to the risk for addiction. Thus, the identification of genes that confer risk for substance use/abuse (e.g., SLC6A3 and MC1R) may have a more modest impact on addiction than an addiction researcher would expect. Moreover, the impact of each unique combination of risk genes in predisposing risk for addiction is the net effect of the contribution of genes, interacting with other genes or modulating genes, to the risk for addiction. We, therefore, suggest that prioritizing gene discovery based on functional data and biological implications (rather than simple association), is essential in
