The predictive values of condom use and the use of condoms at first sex for fecundity, and for the incidence of anogenital chlamydial infection and non-gonococcal urethritis in a rural, multi-racial population were determined. The results indicated that a history of having used condoms more than ten times in the past year was associated with lower fecundity. However, no associations could be found between condom use and either sexually transmitted disease, or the incidence of anogenital chlamydial infection. In conclusion, the results demonstrated that a history of increased condom use in the past year was associated with fewer pregnancies, but no associations were found between consistent condom use and either the incidence of sexually transmitted diseases or the incidence of anogenital chlamydial infection.
