Etruscan Ewer The Etruscan Ewer is an ancient bronze vessel decorated with engraved designs, dating to the 1st millennium BC and found in central Italy, near Vulci in the 1879-1880 excavations of Grazioso Amorini. The Etruscan Ewer is dated to between the 6th century BC to the 4th century BC. The ewer is estimated to weigh about and is 11.5 cm high. It depicts three bodies in profile; the first, second and third are that of a woman, a phallus and an adult male respectively. The phallus also has a protective hand over it and the bottom left of the second figure holds a small cornucopia. The decorations were inscribed in the archaic Greek alphabet. The Etruscan Ewer is today in the Museo Nazionale Etrusco of Villa Giulia in Rome. Function The Etruscan Ewer is similar to earlier objects from the other Bronze Age cultures of North Africa, the Aegean and the Near East, and other pre-Greek geometrical motifs found on the Ionic vase from the 6th century BC and on the Ionic Bronze Prize now in the British Museum from the 7th century BC. There is some evidence of iconographic association with fertility rites and funerary customs. It has been suggested that the bronze phallus was an object from a fertility rite, since the phallus may have been a symbol of potency and fertility. It may also have had a role in the worship of the dead. The anthropomorphic figures were recorded by the archaeologists as being of Egyptian origin. The artist of the figures had probably gone to Egypt and learned the techniques of the Egyptians. The Etruscan Ewer was found in Vulci, a town in the Etruscan-Roman heartland. It may have 595f342e71
