I was only able to get rows however (not entirely sure why). Use a DataReader and read all rows. It works, the problem is that I need to pull 10,000 rows at a time. I've been doing this: Dim cmd As New SqlCommand("SELECT...") cmd.Connection = connection cmd.CommandTimeout = 200000 Using rdr As SqlDataReader = cmd.ExecuteReader 'read all rows End Using And it is WAY, WAY faster than keeping a DataReader open. "A good way to view the effects of using a disconnected DataReader is to open a new Form, do a select statement and trace the effect. Do it to view the elapsed time for each (approximately 50 ms). You'll see that there is no setup time, it is negligible. If you are doing a large query (10,000 rows), this can be time consuming in the end, but because it is so much faster to simply download the data, the total execution time to retrieve 10,000 rows is negligible." "I moved to LA two and a half years ago and fell in love with the city immediately," says Lucy Stevenson. "I'm very much a people watcher and love to be in a city full of different cultures; Los Angeles provides that." Lucy has been a food writer and contributor to a local magazine for over 10 years, but food seems to be a constant reminder of her admiration for the city. "I always have the best food in my house and often work in restaurants, but living there is really inspiring." That's true, but you can do that in other languages. Not to mention that C++ predates Java by a decade. Why not object-oriented programming languages that are native to Windows? As for C++, it actually came about to address Windows issues. C was already quite slow to get to market. And originally object-oriented C was created so that C programs could be morphed into object-oriented languages. Having a separate native language made sense. And because it was based on C, people could already do OOP in other languages. While Microsoft did make it hard to do OOP because C++ was designed for Windows, that didn't prevent people from using OOP in other languages. Microsoft has no need to "tell you" that C++ is C with Classes. It was designed to do that. They also had no need to invent C#. You
