Fully synthetic peptides provide a versatile means to generate proteins having specific binding properties. In this report, we describe a linker system which allows the formation of antigen specificities of different types: T helper epitopes or ligands. The linker can be split into two parts: one part binds the antigen and the other part carries the antigen specificity. The spacer peptide sequence is considered to have a modular character, since it can be changed without affecting the specificity. With this approach it is possible to generate proteins having a specific antigen at one extremity and a second specificity at the other end. The specificities can be linked by a third type of linker that binds to the first specificity. In this way the second specificity becomes part of the third one. This results in a trisppecificity that has not been achieved with the conventional linkers. The use of these linkers has been shown with a model peptide system, with an anti CD4 monoclonal antibody and with T cell specific antigens. This new approach constitutes a valuable tool for the systematic study of antigen specificities.
