Is it normal for a new AC to use mixed Acrylic paints on the first coats? I don't think that using mixing is a good choice. Its hard to fix paint when it is mixed.

Sometimes the paint is a little darker than the base paint color and I have to mix it again. Is there a rule about that? A: There's no question it is normal. Acrylics are typically more opaque than oil paints, so it's not as easy to mix multiple colours. Use colour charts to see which colours match your base coat and mix those on the same palette. Use a separate palette to mix other colours. It's not always what you think it should be, and that can often be fixed with a light touch of a brush or palette knife. A: It is normal to mix a few shades at a time during the first layer. It can happen that you need to mix two different colors for a given area to achieve an accurate color match. I would start out with a palette that has only the color, and gradually mix to achieve desired color. Sometimes, I will mix the color I want to paint on, then mix an off-color when I think I need it. Start with the lightest color you can, and you will probably have a good match. In addition to starting off with smaller amounts, I will often add more paint from another palette to the color that needs 6d1f23a050
