Anaerobic hydrolysis of municipal solid waste under subcritical conditions. The hydrolysis of municipal solid waste under anaerobic conditions is investigated using a batch reactor, model wastewater, and a physical model. Constant energy input is used to control the inorganic carbon content in a system where there is substrate limitation. Batch reactors of about 25 to 300 ml show that the maximum amount of hydrolysis possible is about 60% of chemical oxygen demand (COD) at a temperature of about 190 degrees C and a pH of 7.6. The hydrolysis decreases with a rise in temperature and a concomitant rise in pH. The results show that if the hydrolysis of a large amount of COD in the absence of external energy to control the inorganic carbon can be done as effectively as in batch reactors with a small amount of input energy, large reactors may be used to hydrolyze 100,000 m³ of waste per year. The hydrolysis of waste at high temperatures can be carried out using no input energy, except that needed to keep the reactor at operating temperature. This means that, as in batch reactors, 100,000 m³ of waste can be hydrolyzed in large reactors without input energy except that of exothermic heat. The hydrolysis can be made more effective by using high temperatures and low pH values. These results are made possible through the use of physical models. The models show that for an input energy of 10 megajoules per cubic meter (megalJ) of COD hydrolyzed, the same amount of COD can be hydrolyzed with a much smaller input energy of 1 megalJ. Music Friday: Listen to Jenna Brine on "Sometimes I Think We're Not Very, Um... Different" "Sometimes I Think We're Not Very, Um... Different." Jenna Brine is currently traveling the world with her band, Phoebus. In October, they'll be on their first European tour, a few dates in Germany, and then (once again) Europe in March. Brine met J.D. at a Frick Park music showcase over the summer, and recently recorded "Sometimes I Think We're 6d1f23a050
