Pes 2013 Patch Commentary Fares Awad Arab Free DawnleadQ: Should I Include an "Expiry Date" in a Web Application? I'm using a build server to build and deploy a web app on a clients behalf. The client says he doesn't want an expiry date in the app itself. Is that ok? Should I add an expiry date to the settings.php? Do the people who access the app have to know? What about changing the link by pressing it again and again? Another thing is, what happens when the user doesn't log in? The app runs, but the user doesn't know that it will be expired in X hours. What is an internet client supposed to do in that case? Try and log in? The app is already deployed, and it's a simple client and not complicated, just need a bit of feedback about what happens in certain situations. A: The client says he doesn't want an expiry date in the app itself. Nothing wrong with that - unless it's an "unlimited session" type app, there's no need to impose a session length. Should I add an expiry date to the settings.php? Depends how you mean by "expiry date". If you mean you need to remember when you last accessed the app - then just don't forget to hit Ctrl-F5 every day. If you mean that there needs to be an API that
