a 'freeware' is not free software. it is software available for free to use and for free to redistribute. these programs are not automatically free software. a freeware is not open source software and generally, the free usage does not include the ability to modify it. the majority of the freeware is designed to be used within certain restrictions and it is intended to remain free software. those who release freeware are usually not open source developers. the software is under a license that allows certain acts of copying, distribution, and modification (including but not limited to translation into other languages). the license terms may require users of the software to also provide certain rights to the owners of the software. this aspect is commonly referred to as a "copyleft" license, and it causes the software to be free software. note that the above does not apply to firmware in regular firmware files or embedded firmware as in one of the files used in android builds, where the firmware is already embedded at the binary level. that is, the firmware never leaves the device once it is loaded. the only cases where it may be reasonable to refer to them as free software are those described below: this license lets you download a free version and use it for as long as you want, as long as you don't make any money from it. if you distribute it, you must give users the "strongest freedom possible" so the software can be changed or improved, and the source code must be provided. how does the entrust identity app work? once installed on your mobile device, the entrust identity app will be configured in your mobile device network settings and you will use it within the network. during enrollment, you will select the device from your network that you wish to enroll, you will provide an account number and password to the device and by default the device will use the carriers authentication protocol (eap) to authenticate you. the entrust identity app does not access any of your financial information and the device will not ask for your password as you enter the authentication protocol. the device will be authenticated and you will be presented with a screen to enter your account number and password so that the device is authenticated. once the device is authenticated, your request to perform a transaction will be accepted. as part of the authentication process, the device will be required to attest to the validity of the transaction. you will be given the option to approve or reject the transaction. 5ec8ef588b
