The California State Senate on Tuesday approved a bill that would require a two-year civil union for same-sex couples in the state, an effort to extend marriage rights to same-sex couples who currently have the sole option of a domestic partnership. The bill, SB 1176, passed in the Senate 36-14 and now heads to Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) for his signature. It will extend civil rights to same-sex couples if Schwarzenegger signs the bill, leaving only a measure of the courts to decide if the law goes into effect. "As we see more and more heterosexual couples marry, it's time that we give California's same-sex couples the same freedom to enter into committed relationships and build families," said state Sen. Mark Leno (D), the author of the bill. In November 2007, voters in California approved an initiative that gave same-sex couples the right to register domestic partnerships. Under Leno's bill, the domestic partnership of same-sex couples would be honored in the same way as a marriage, with the couple entitled to file joint tax returns, share property and qualify for the rights and benefits of married couples. When asked about the issue of marriage equality in a January interview with The Hill, Schwarzenegger said he would "think about" the issue. In February, Schwarzenegger said he was not a supporter of the proposition on the California ballot calling for the legalization of gay marriage and civil unions. Schwarzenegger was elected governor in 2003, the same year he started a political action committee (PAC), the California Conservation Action Committee. But since Schwarzenegger is a Republican and a former bodybuilder who has been vocal about his opposition to gay marriage, he came under attack
