The outline tool in Photoshop acts like a stack of paper with a layer. Any other layer within the stack creates a new outline layer, and you can move or copy any one of those layers to any other inside the stack to create more of them. Each new outline layer drags with you to any of the original outline layers inside the stack, and you can paste or duplicate it to wherever you want. You can even collapse each layer, ungroup, or hide individual layers. Using these tools, you can easily create a selection within a grayscale image that completely encompasses regions of the image. You can then easily apply a gradient to the selected area, change its blending options, or make it either transparent or white, and create a selection to replace the gradient with any colors you want. Use the dodge and burn tool to burn random areas of an image. The content-aware fill tool is a powerful tool that can use your original content and adapt it by extending it, removing duplicate, non-essential content, or creating new content. When you have content-aware fill tools, you use the original image as a stencil to create new content. You'll need to provide a minimum amount of additional content and then Adobe Photoshop will adjust your original image to include the new content. If you are working with an image that you created from a photograph, you will probably want to scroll horizontally and zoom in and out of your image using the scroll wheel on your mouse or the scroll bars on your screen. You can use the scroll bars to adjust the overall scaling of the image. You can also adjust the amount of image in the viewport using the scroll wheel on the top bar. The tool tips for these features will provide an explanation of what you can do, and you can have more control over how your image looks if you want. 933d7f57e6
