The idea of running software as complex as Photoshop directly in the browser would have been hard to imagine just a few years ago. However, by using various new web technologies, Adobe has now brought Photoshop to the web.

Here are a few of the key technologies that were used in bringing Photoshop to the web:

WebAssembly is a bytecode language that is designed to be a safe and efficient way to run code in the browser without requiring use of a virtual machine. Instead of translating code into another language like Java or Python, like many other bytecode languages, WebAssembly code executes directly in the browser. WebAssembly has only recently been gaining adoption by browser developers. The fact that it is a native language that can run directly in the browser without requiring a virtual machine means it can run much faster than many other bytecode languages. The speed of WebAssembly could be a game changer for the overall performance of the web. 933d7f57e6
