Time-dependent responses of temperate white spruce (Picea glauca [Moench] Voss) to ozone (O₃) and water stress. In spring 1999, we investigated the responses of growth, anatomy, gas exchange, chlorophyll fluorescence, and leaf water potential in young, fully-exposed spruce trees to rising O₃ concentrations and during a period of water stress (WD), compared to well-watered control trees. Four ozone treatments were used over a period of 18 weeks: ambient + 1.5 ppm (OA), ambient + 3 ppm (OA1.5), ambient + 6 ppm (OA3) and ambient + 10 ppm (OA6). The two water treatments were WD and well-watered. We found that the responses to O₃ depended on time of exposure. Responses to O₃ occurred within the first three weeks of O₃ treatment, and the effects were similar for WD and well-watered trees. During the latter half of the experiment, there was an effect of O₃ on WD trees but not on well-watered trees. The most pronounced response occurred in P(n) fluorescence, expressed as F_v/F_m, and the longest time to return to F_v/F_m basal values was observed in OA6 trees. Water stress had the opposite effect: F_v/F_m declined and the time to recovery decreased with increasing water stress. This study clearly showed that WD and exposure to O₃ are stressful to P. glauca, and the physiological effects can be distinguished. To our knowledge, this is the first time that the effects of WD and O₃ have been correlated.
