Now I'm wondering if there's a better way to write this. I already have a method that will verify the full string:

def self.verify_account(param) self.verify("account:", param) end

 Is there any way I can just verify it's just an account: or something like that? A: You can use a regular expression to make sure that the string starts with account: and then you can continue by using the given string as a pattern to verify the given substring:

def verify(pattern, param) if param =~ /^account:/.match(param) # do stuff else raise "Invalid account: #{param}" end end

 This will result in a more flexible code where you can decide whether to only allow certain characters as account names or whatever. Q: Как

Inputs: 1. phrase: the phrase in question 2. removeall: a boolean value, to remove all of the word from the text (false=remove all, true=leave the word alone) Outputs: 1. copyall: a boolean value, to copy the input all the way or not (false=no, true=yes) Explanation: This macro copies and pastes the given phrase to the clipboard. To see if the macro works, go to the (end) of the sentence in the.txt editor, copy the sentence and paste in the clipboard. Or, select the phrase and copy it, paste the clipboard in the editor and change the "Include selection" setting to "No". If the phrase is in fact copied to the clipboard, the macro will copy it all the way through. If you do not wish to copy it all the way, then go to the (end) of the sentence, and check the "Include selection" setting to "No", and change the "Include Selection" to "Yes", and copy the words. If the phrase is selected, only the selected phrase is copied. If the phrase is not copied, it is because you have turned off the Include selection setting in the macro, and have left it set to "No" *NOTE: I recommend you check the Macro Settings by pressing Shift + F3 Are you a beginner or intermediate developer, and need to increase your skills and knowledge? DupBlock Activation

DupBlock is a tiny application capable of executing one simple task, and that is creating blocks of text based on a single phrase or any group of words. The reasons for employing the use of such an app may vary, but it looks like it has something to do with creating material for printed banners or flyers. Interface and features DupBlock comes with a simple interface sporting few commands. In fact, half of the working space is taken by the text panel, where you type in or paste what you wish to duplicate. The bottom part of the layout allows one to use variables and choose how many times a block should be repeated.

Appending data is also a possibility, and can be activated by checking a box. The variables can be characters, numbers, or words that can replace any word from your original text, and their main purpose could be how your variable output would look compared to the original. A bit faulty regarding the output format A negative aspect of Dupblock would be the output format list, which is missing. However, manually adding.txt or.rtf to the end of the output location will save your work as a simple text file, or a better formatted RTF. The DOC, DOCX, and PDF formats were tested but without success, as an error would close the document upon launching. Also, it's worth mentioning that one can add new blocks to the same output file, as long as the output location is not changed in any way. This way, you can test run a piece of text without creating numerous instances of text files. Conclusion Despite being close to two decades old, and a small issue with the output format, DupBlock is still up and running. On the other hand, duplicating blocks of text is not a popular activity, so the audience numbers won't be that great. Still, if it can help one person one time, then it's indeed helpful.
