If you use Lightroom as your primary application, then integration of the application with other tools is a matter of preference. For example, my workflow usually consists of converting RAW to DNG and Adobe Camera Raw, editing the images in Camera Raw and fine-tuning the output in Photoshop. This means that I use Lightroom's Book module for cataloging. My workflow then transitions to Photoshop for the final grade adjustments. After the latest update, I'm not sure if LR is fast enough. It's a big tool, so a bit like a minivan: it can carry a lot of weight but I don't think it's handling it all with enough gusto. I'm using Lightroom 5.4 RTM – and I'm still working on a number of projects. I am feeling strongly right now that the Classic UI is still essential. I was a bit disappointed in the new LR 5.4, and decided against upgrading to its beta release – for now, getting five or six releases behind is probably not going to be a big concern. I guess the big number used for the number of users is around 230M. I only have about 30M now – but I've worked a lot of hours – so the future does seem bright. I can see how important the cloud is – and trust that Adobe will make it work. For me, the key issue now is processing speed – and LR5.4 seems to be bogging down a bit too much. I am no photographer, though, so perhaps this is a problem others experience also. I have used Photoshop CS3 and 11 as well as PS Elements and Elements 11. I have never used LR or PS, so this review will be based on knowing nothing about those products. I have no experience with on-line product updates. I have just updated my PC to a new CPU and RAM, as well as a new hard drive.
