Epidemiological evidence suggests that respiratory tract infections contribute to the development of chronic laryngitis, but the molecular basis for this association remains to be clarified. In this study, the messenger RNA expression levels of genes known to play a role in the pathogenesis of various mucosal inflammatory disorders, including laryngopharyngeal reflux and laryngotracheitis, were evaluated in chronic laryngitis patients. The laryngitis transcriptome was compared to that of control larynges from patients with no active vocal fold lesions and healthy larynges. Messenger RNA levels of genes involved in inflammation and cell proliferation/apoptosis were measured using real-time PCR in 42 control larynges, 42 chronic laryngitis patient larynges and 10 laryngeal tissue biopsies. Compared with controls, the messenger RNA level of the proteins implicated in various aspects of laryngitis, i.e., the epidermal growth factor receptor, interleukins 1 and 6, intercellular adhesion molecule 1 and vascular cell adhesion molecule 1, as well as genes involved in cell proliferation/apoptosis, were significantly increased in the patients with chronic laryngitis. Increased expression of the same inflammatory and cell proliferation/apoptosis genes was observed in the laryngeal biopsies taken from the patients with chronic laryngitis. These results suggest that local tissue inflammation could contribute to the development of chronic laryngitis in susceptible individuals. Prenatal ultrasonographic diagnosis of an arteriovenous malformation of the tongue. A case of a true arteriovenous malformation of the tongue in a fetus at 17 weeks of gestation is presented. At 30 weeks of gestation, the fetus was found to
