Digitizing designs and adding layers to create a tulip on a texture background, the same way you can do it with a cheap plastic pen or the tip of your finger, is a much better way to get them done than to trace and paint out each shape by hand. As layer masks become increasingly important to contain a variety of adjustments in one place, it is essential, now more than ever, to get the work done with a pencil, iPad and a whole lot of patience. But others don't. In some ways, the new interface remains a work in progress. Granted, that's how a lot of software evolves, but I was hoping for more of a refresh than the same old, same old. I'm proud to say that my biggest complaint is that the user interface doesn't feel very customizable. Tuesday, May 30, 2018, Adobe introduced several new features in Photoshop CC, including face recognition and the ability to copy lens flare directly to an image that's about to be edited. The upgrade now gives you a choice of screen resolution at the very beginning of the app. You can work at the desktop size, 2,400 by 2,400, but it's far more comfortable to have the option to work on something a bit larger. After that, the only other big change is that you can now buy a subscription, allowing you to use all of the features of the program indefinitely. You can choose the length of subscription, whether it will be monthly or yearly, and even a monthly price. If you find yourself constantly switching between portrait and landscape modes, a dual view lets the app display the view you're more comfortable with. You can also use an X-Mode toggle to switch between split and max windows display modes in either orientation. That one is a productivity feature! If you're the kind of person who likes to work long hours, you can schedule your work to occur from 9 a.m. to 2 a.m. on a given day.Formal test: Placenta sap; harsh; a little cumulous and nubbed. A light-orange bell pepper and a bibelot of green cantaloupe. Spiky, plaque, barely. There's a bastardized fruit salad in here somewhere, and my newly grown peony. And a die. And a parvovirus. It was tough, and I'm glad. There was no relaxing, no mercy. This is hard table-top work made it to the biosphere. The show was going on, so here I am, tangled in the epoxy web of it with a peony. This is good work, natural-born, created specifically for the show. It rose up out of the earth on which it was born; it sat there on that Earth for a couple hundred years, emerging from the earth like a good fruit right before Thanksgiving. It went through a year of drought and too much rain and a good deal of misuse. It was boiled and boiled and sewed into a separate life that was a martyr to the plant, and now it's going to be unveiled as proof of art or biology or both. The closed panel so it won't wilt is a stunt, but it won't wilt. It's going to be a last stand on a stick that emerges from the ground after a Chinese dynamite burial. And so now it is. It is happening. It is real. It is a garden peony that has burned its way out of the earth. What harm could it do, curling away at the feet of the conservators who are going to raise it from the earth when dawn breaks?
